By the time he had reached the Queen s Road, Foulerton had forgotten what the Comedy was about. He fell asleep trying to trace a coherent plot behind its glamour; but as that had been obliterated by the manager for fear of making his audience think, the Major s failure was less discreditable to his intellect than he supposed. On the following morning after breakfast he took the same train to Brighton by which Mrs. St. George had travelled three days before. Foulerton found Brighton smarting under a warm sun and a biting wind. As it was a regular March day he enjoyed it patriotically. He thought the grey-green Channel, shrinking back, petulant and wrinkled, under the whip of the breeze, lovelier than the dark-blue tropic seas he had lately crossed. The cabman turned up the collar of his coat; the Major undid the buttons of his. This is the sort of thing for English lungs! he said. The driver politely regretted that it ill suited his complaint. Finding a sympathetic listener, he gave the Major an account of his symptoms, to which, however, as they approached the school the latter forgot to listen. So far Foulerton had smothered his misgivings, but now the thing must be faced. He rang the bell and dismissed the cabman. The whitecapped maid opened the door. The pallid drawing-room in which Mrs. St. George had shuddered received him with the faintest odour of primroses--the...
