The Ballads of the Ace of Spades A Poor wight sold his soul to the Devil, And this was the covenant made, He should spend his life in card-playing And win where er he played, And ever should hold in sign thereof The great Black Ace, the Spade. He played and won, he got great wealth, He ne er was sad or sick, He built his nest and feathered it With feathers soft and thick As a goose-down bed in a merchant s house In the cold of Reikjavik. He played and won, he played and won, His winnings were untold, All day long at the card-table He sat and gathered gold, He carried it away in bags More than his hands could hold.
