The sentiments of the mojl eminent of the modern writers subjoined to those of the ancients. SINCE the supposed discovery of a vacuum, some have confidently affirmed, that natural effects are no way to be accounted for, but. by the power of the Deity immediately interested: and either the reason of man, or the reason of things, is so altered, that what did serve formerly as a ground-work to atheism, is now recommended as the only sure foundation of natural religion; as if it were impossible for God to act by secondary causes, without tempting us to believe, that such causes were able to contrive and frame a world without his interposition. Thofe who object to se. cond causes, upon any pretensions to religious motives, must imagine surely, that matter, is there is but enough of it, can move,...
